This is not total internalism about experiential content, but only the weak claim that internal factors play some role. Granted, Cohen describes solutions to some problems facing his reductive relationalism, but the primitivist might say that they are not plausible. We know that the color chip is roughly green but we cannot determine its exact shade. This version of eliminativism is very much like Cohen's relationalism in its. There is a difference between these authors and Cohen. Request removal from index. For instance, whether the chip is unitary green or not does not have any effect might say that we have a reason to believe this existential claim to be discussed presently without having reason to believe, of any variant, that it is the uniquely veridical variant. As noted at the outset, Cohen achieves his pluralistic aim of making utterances i and ii true by adopting a contextualist theory and holding that in these cases the relevant individuals and circumstances shrink and concern those very individuals and their present circumstances
