What do we owe to other people? Reply to Commentators pp. Thomson makes the extraordinary argument that this regularly occurring concept needs to eventually fail simply because its uncomplicated requirement--that humans may still act to result in the "most good"--is meaningless.

ScienceandTechnologyEthics.IntroductionAmyGutmannpp. Thomson starts off via lamenting the superiority of the concept that there's an unbridgeable hole among truth and value--that to assert anything is nice, for instance, isn't really to nation a truth, yet to do anything extra like expressing an angle or feeling. Thomson makes the striking argument that this familiar theory must ultimately fail because its basic requirement--that people should act to bring about the "most good"--is meaningless.

This secure and good method of esoteric disciplines is predicated on Oriental
