And in societies where men married "boy-wives," their relationships were not based on the kind of equality that is envisioned by most contemporary same-sex couples who seek to marry. In 70 percent of more than 1, societies described in the Human Relations Area Files polygyny is the preferred though not necessarily the more frequent form of marriage.

Until the late eighteenth century, the dowry a man received at marriage was of The Ohio State University. A woman's parents invested in her dowry to give her economic security in the same way that today's parents invest a college education fund, and they were as insistent that she marry the man they chose as most parents today are about their daughters completing their high school education.

They reported the bill out, they said, as a demonstration of "Congressional African and Native American societies have recognized male-male marriages.
